

TO PLACE BLAME FOR 'L' ACCIDENT

Coroner, Not Convinced that the Dead Motorman Should Shoulder All Responsibility, Makes Investigation.

The Coroner to-day started an investigation of the tragedy on the Fifth avenue line of the Brooklyn Elevated Railroad between Twenty-ninth and Thirtieth streets where two men were killed and nine seriously injured. Not convinced that John Cahill, the dead motorman, was the only man who could give a satisfactory explanation, the Coroner will examine all the men who had anything to do with the movements of the train of that line.

Conductor Stevens Arrested.

Police Capt. Evans and Detective Banks, of the Fourth avenue police station, arrested Martin Stevens to-day at his home, No. 72 Franklin avenue. He was the conductor of the stalled train. The charges preferred were criminal negligence, based on a failure to place signals on the rear train after it had been stalled.

When arraigned later in the day before Magistrate Tigue Stevens was discharged, as no evidence was presented which showed that he was responsible in any way for the accident.

President E. W. Winters, of the Brooklyn Rapid Transit, said to an Evening World reporter to-day: "We are investigating this matter thoroughly and will try to fix the responsibility. However, we believe we will never be able to do so. Mr. Cahill, who was killed, was formerly a locomotive fireman and had been for eleven months a motorman. Just what happened to him that made him disregard the signals placed on the train, so far as we know, we will never learn. The information that the stalled train before the accident was not the only one that was stalled on the line at that time, and that the train which was stalled on the rear of the train and swung away from the point of the accident, reports that he saw the red lights on the stalled train before the accident. The brakes on the rear train had not been applied. The actual material loss to the company will be about $25,000."

The accident occurred when trains were being hurried to the bridge to take home the thousands of passengers from New York. A blow-up of a fuse stalled one of the trains between stations. Conductor Stevens hurried to the rear platform. He testified that both red lamps were in order.

Had to Run for His Life.

Looking back the track he saw the Bay Ridge train behind him, full speed. He says he apprehended danger, and, seizing another red lantern, swung it until he was forced to run for his life. He dropped the lantern and reached the second car none too soon.

With a deafening crash the two trains came together, the motor car of the Bay Ridge train telescoping the rear car of the train ahead. Soon the air was filled with the shrieks of the wounded and the cries of the frightened men and women. That there were comparatively few deaths and injuries is due to the fact that the stalled train was empty, and that most of the passengers of the Bay Ridge train were in the rear coaches.

ALIENIST ADMITS HE MADE A MISTAKE

Sprightly Witness in Damage Suit Was Same Woman Whom He Once Testified Would Be a Cripple for Life.

Dr. Graeme M. Hammond, an alienist, testified to-day before Justice Adelbert P. Rich, of Auburn, sitting in Manhattan, that Patrick McQuade's death from brain trouble was traceable to a fractured wrist, got in a street-car collision some months earlier. It was the trial of the suit of Ellen McQuade, his widow, for $20,000 damages from the Metropolitan Street Railway Company. The Metropolitan claimed that the brain trouble was due to a disease of the middle ear, and that the fractured wrist had nothing to do with it.

Before cross-examining him, Henry L. Scheurman called Miss Cecelia J. Zimmer, of Long Island City, to the stand.

"Were you plaintiff in a suit for damages in Queens County several years ago in which you were awarded a verdict of $15,000?"

"It was," replied the witness. "Was Dr. Graeme M. Hammond a witness in your behalf?"

"He was."

"Were you brought into court testifying in an invalid chair and heaped up with blankets?"

"I was. I testified from the chair."

Then the railroad's attorney elicited that Dr. Hammond had testified as a medical expert that Miss Zimmer would be helpless for life. She has entirely recovered.

Mr. Scheurman recalled Dr. Hammond. "Apparently I was mistaken in my diagnosis of Miss Zimmer's case," said he. The jury was unable to agree, and the widow McQuade must try again.

DEAD WHEN CALLED.

Charged with Desecration of a Corpse.

George P. F. Rich, of No. 37 Springfield street, has been arraigned to-day on a charge of desecration preferred by the State. When the case was called, the attorney announced that the body had been found two days ago.

JAPANESE PLAY PART AMERICAN

Yankees Intrude in the Onoto Watanna Drama, "A Japanese Nightingale," Adding Melodramatic Features to It.

"A Japanese Nightingale," which built its nest last night at Daly's, sang rather a mixed song.

It was a trifle difficult at first to get the lay of the thing, but when the jovial American tourist poked a revolver under the nose of the cringing Japanese villain your joyous, jumping, patriotic heart told you it was good old U. S. A. melodrama.

The piece has been beautifully staged by Klaw & Erlanger.

"There are a few too many of us in the play which William Young has adapted from the novel of Onoto Watanna, who a short while ago caused a ripple in Forty-second street by claiming to have written 'The Darling of the Gods'."

"The concoction would be a stronger cup of tea if it had less American seasoning."

Loves a Gelsa.

"Jack" Bigelow, otherwise Orrin Johnson, of heart courageous, rushes forward and starts a "rough-house." Yuki flees. So does "Jack." He is soliloquizing on the road to Tokyo, when she pops out of the bushes, a beautiful girl, painting out of something which looks like vegetable portraiture. They have never spoken before. But that doesn't matter. "Jack" swears before a dinky god that he loves her and wants her for wife, and they hustle over to the Imperial Hotel and get married by an American minister.

Then Nekko gets busy and shows that George Arliss isn't the only Japanese villain who can give New York shivers. He tires Yuki, a nakado (which is Japanese for schachten), to steal the American Consul's seal, and the book containing the record of the marriage stolen.

Looking for Sister.

With these pleasant preparations made, Taro, the brother of Yuki, who has been "Jack's" college buddy, returns from America looking for sister.

When he finds her with "Jack" and without any proof of their marriage the family circle assumes a warlike aspect. For fear that "Jack" like the American Consul, will be murdered, Yuki, with her Yale picked mind, makes a quiet sneak to the Temple of Shiba, nobly resolved to dance herself to death. "Jack" and his pal, "Bobby" Newcombe, get into the sacred dance hall without a visitor's card and witness her specialty.

But they're not allowed to go behind the scenes, and next you see the dejected husband he's sitting in his lonely cottage wondering whether he will sell the furniture or have it stored.

"The song of the nightingale is heard. 'Am I dreaming?' asks 'Jack.' No, he is not. For the first time in his life, he has seen the moonlight. Yuki, the next minute Yuki isn't in the moonlight. She's in 'Jack's' arms."

"Jack" is protecting her with his strong right, when Nekko, who's brother and a Cherry Hill rethru, comes in to perform the separation act.

But hold, Nekko! You have forgotten

the jolly, fat "foreign devil." He comes smiling forward with the name of the minister in a red vest-pocket notebook, and after him "Bobby," dragging the covering lid, who tells all. Even the consular records are recovered and exhibited, the murder and plot are revealed and Nekko gets it in the flesh syllable of his name.

All this with dreamy, quaint, fanciful settings for a background and a capable company to tell the story.

Margaret Illington made a charming Yuki, especially in the excellent second act, where she portrayed the changing moods of the half-happy, half-frightened, shy, shrinking bride. She was aro and pretty, and her reading of the lines was music to the ear.

Orrin Johnson, as "Jack," was his usual handsome, good-natured self, and particularly strong when it came to hugging Yuki, for which there was almost as much opportunity as a Coney Island boat on a summer night can offer.

The jolly, fat "foreign devil." He comes smiling forward with the name of the minister in a red vest-pocket notebook, and after him "Bobby," dragging the covering lid, who tells all. Even the consular records are recovered and exhibited, the murder and plot are revealed and Nekko gets it in the flesh syllable of his name.

All this with dreamy, quaint, fanciful settings for a background and a capable company to tell the story.

Margaret Illington made a charming Yuki, especially in the excellent second act, where she portrayed the changing moods of the half-happy, half-frightened, shy, shrinking bride. She was aro and pretty, and her reading of the lines was music to the ear.

Orrin Johnson, as "Jack," was his usual handsome, good-natured self, and particularly strong when it came to hugging Yuki, for which there was almost as much opportunity as a Coney Island boat on a summer night can offer.

The jolly, fat "foreign devil." He comes smiling forward with the name of the minister in a red vest-pocket notebook, and after him "Bobby," dragging the covering lid, who tells all. Even the consular records are recovered and exhibited, the murder and plot are revealed and Nekko gets it in the flesh syllable of his name.

All this with dreamy, quaint, fanciful settings for a background and a capable company to tell the story.

Margaret Illington made a charming Yuki, especially in the excellent second act, where she portrayed the changing moods of the half-happy, half-frightened, shy, shrinking bride. She was aro and pretty, and her reading of the lines was music to the ear.

Orrin Johnson, as "Jack," was his usual handsome, good-natured self, and particularly strong when it came to hugging Yuki, for which there was almost as much opportunity as a Coney Island boat on a summer night can offer.

The jolly, fat "foreign devil." He comes smiling forward with the name of the minister in a red vest-pocket notebook, and after him "Bobby," dragging the covering lid, who tells all. Even the consular records are recovered and exhibited, the murder and plot are revealed and Nekko gets it in the flesh syllable of his name.

All this with dreamy, quaint, fanciful settings for a background and a capable company to tell the story.

Margaret Illington made a charming Yuki, especially in the excellent second act, where she portrayed the changing moods of the half-happy, half-frightened, shy, shrinking bride. She was aro and pretty, and her reading of the lines was music to the ear.

Orrin Johnson, as "Jack," was his usual handsome, good-natured self, and particularly strong when it came to hugging Yuki, for which there was almost as much opportunity as a Coney Island boat on a summer night can offer.

The jolly, fat "foreign devil." He comes smiling forward with the name of the minister in a red vest-pocket notebook, and after him "Bobby," dragging the covering lid, who tells all. Even the consular records are recovered and exhibited, the murder and plot are revealed and Nekko gets it in the flesh syllable of his name.

All this with dreamy, quaint, fanciful settings for a background and a capable company to tell the story.

Margaret Illington made a charming Yuki, especially in the excellent second act, where she portrayed the changing moods of the half-happy, half-frightened, shy, shrinking bride. She was aro and pretty, and her reading of the lines was music to the ear.

Orrin Johnson, as "Jack," was his usual handsome, good-natured self, and particularly strong when it came to hugging Yuki, for which there was almost as much opportunity as a Coney Island boat on a summer night can offer.

The jolly, fat "foreign devil." He comes smiling forward with the name of the minister in a red vest-pocket notebook, and after him "Bobby," dragging the covering lid, who tells all. Even the consular records are recovered and exhibited, the murder and plot are revealed and Nekko gets it in the flesh syllable of his name.

All this with dreamy, quaint, fanciful settings for a background and a capable company to tell the story.

Margaret Illington made a charming Yuki, especially in the excellent second act, where she portrayed the changing moods of the half-happy, half-frightened, shy, shrinking bride. She was aro and pretty, and her reading of the lines was music to the ear.

Orrin Johnson, as "Jack," was his usual handsome, good-natured self, and particularly strong when it came to hugging Yuki, for which there was almost as much opportunity as a Coney Island boat on a summer night can offer.

EVERYBODY BUYS ON CREDIT

WHY NOT YOU? OUR FACILITIES FOR SERVING YOU ARE UNSURPASSED. OUR STOCKS LARGE AND UP TO DATE, AND OUR TERMS ARE UNUSUALLY LIBERAL. BY AN OUTLAY OF LESS THAN 15 CENTS PER DAY AND OUR EASY PAYMENT SYSTEM YOU CAN HAVE WHAT YOU NEED IN MEN'S, WOMEN'S & CHILDREN'S CLOTHING.

FURS, MILLINERY, DIAMONDS, WATCHES AND JEWELRY. WEAR IT AND PAY FOR IT ON EASY WEEKLY OR MONTHLY PAYMENTS. PER WEEK $1 PER WEEK. PRICES SAME AS FOR CASH. MANHATTAN CLOTHING CO.

1114 3d Ave., Near 65th St. 2274 4th Ave., Near 124th St. 295 8th Ave., Near 24th St. BROOKLYN, 700 BROADWAY. OPEN EVENINGS.

MRS. FOLSEY GOES FREE.

On Trial for Bigamy, Jury Recommended Verdict for Acquittal.

Helen Carson Folsey was arraigned before Judge Warren B. Foster to-day, charged with bigamy. It was shown that she had married John J. Folsey, of No. 249 Spring street, and William A. Folsey, of Arlington.

The young woman did not deny the marriage, but she produced testimony concerning Folsey's treatment of her that led the jury to make a recommendation for mercy. Judge Foster allowed her to go under suspended sentence.

ACTOR'S MONEY HELD UP.

Adler's Bank Account Attached for Judgment Against Him.

Jacob P. Adler, the Jewish tragedian, whose Shylock won much attention, asked Justice Conlan, of the City Court, to-day, to make the Oriental Bank, in the Bowery, honor the checks the actor draws upon his account there.

When Mr. Adler presented his check at the bank yesterday he was met with the reply: "The bank has no account with you."

"Jack" Bigelow, otherwise Orrin Johnson, of heart courageous, rushes forward and starts a "rough-house." Yuki flees. So does "Jack." He is soliloquizing on the road to Tokyo, when she pops out of the bushes, a beautiful girl, painting out of something which looks like vegetable portraiture. They have never spoken before. But that doesn't matter. "Jack" swears before a dinky god that he loves her and wants her for wife, and they hustle over to the Imperial Hotel and get married by an American minister.

Then Nekko gets busy and shows that George Arliss isn't the only Japanese villain who can give New York shivers. He tires Yuki, a nakado (which is Japanese for schachten), to steal the American Consul's seal, and the book containing the record of the marriage stolen.

Looking for Sister.

With these pleasant preparations made, Taro, the brother of Yuki, who has been "Jack's" college buddy, returns from America looking for sister.

When he finds her with "Jack" and without any proof of their marriage the family circle assumes a warlike aspect. For fear that "Jack" like the American Consul, will be murdered, Yuki, with her Yale picked mind, makes a quiet sneak to the Temple of Shiba, nobly resolved to dance herself to death. "Jack" and his pal, "Bobby" Newcombe, get into the sacred dance hall without a visitor's card and witness her specialty.

But they're not allowed to go behind the scenes, and next you see the dejected husband he's sitting in his lonely cottage wondering whether he will sell the furniture or have it stored.

"The song of the nightingale is heard. 'Am I dreaming?' asks 'Jack.' No, he is not. For the first time in his life, he has seen the moonlight. Yuki, the next minute Yuki isn't in the moonlight. She's in 'Jack's' arms."

"Jack" is protecting her with his strong right, when Nekko, who's brother and a Cherry Hill rethru, comes in to perform the separation act.

But hold, Nekko! You have forgotten

the jolly, fat "foreign devil." He comes smiling forward with the name of the minister in a red vest-pocket notebook, and after him "Bobby," dragging the covering lid, who tells all. Even the consular records are recovered and exhibited, the murder and plot are revealed and Nekko gets it in the flesh syllable of his name.

All this with dreamy, quaint, fanciful settings for a background and a capable company to tell the story.

Margaret Illington made a charming Yuki, especially in the excellent second act, where she portrayed the changing moods of the half-happy, half-frightened, shy, shrinking bride. She was aro and pretty, and her reading of the lines was music to the ear.

Orrin Johnson, as "Jack," was his usual handsome, good-natured self, and particularly strong when it came to hugging Yuki, for which there was almost as much opportunity as a Coney Island boat on a summer night can offer.

The jolly, fat "foreign devil." He comes smiling forward with the name of the minister in a red vest-pocket notebook, and after him "Bobby," dragging the covering lid, who tells all. Even the consular records are recovered and exhibited, the murder and plot are revealed and Nekko gets it in the flesh syllable of his name.

All this with dreamy, quaint, fanciful settings for a background and a capable company to tell the story.

Margaret Illington made a charming Yuki, especially in the excellent second act, where she portrayed the changing moods of the half-happy, half-frightened, shy, shrinking bride. She was aro and pretty, and her reading of the lines was music to the ear.

Orrin Johnson, as "Jack," was his usual handsome, good-natured self, and particularly strong when it came to hugging Yuki, for which there was almost as much opportunity as a Coney Island boat on a summer night can offer.

The jolly, fat "foreign devil." He comes smiling forward with the name of the minister in a red vest-pocket notebook, and after him "Bobby," dragging the covering lid, who tells all. Even the consular records are recovered and exhibited, the murder and plot are revealed and Nekko gets it in the flesh syllable of his name.

All this with dreamy, quaint, fanciful settings for a background and a capable company to tell the story.

Margaret Illington made a charming Yuki, especially in the excellent second act, where she portrayed the changing moods of the half-happy, half-frightened, shy, shrinking bride. She was aro and pretty, and her reading of the lines was music to the ear.

Orrin Johnson, as "Jack," was his usual handsome, good-natured self, and particularly strong when it came to hugging Yuki, for which there was almost as much opportunity as a Coney Island boat on a summer night can offer.

The jolly, fat "foreign devil." He comes smiling forward with the name of the minister in a red vest-pocket notebook, and after him "Bobby," dragging the covering lid, who tells all. Even the consular records are recovered and exhibited, the murder and plot are revealed and Nekko gets it in the flesh syllable of his name.

All this with dreamy, quaint, fanciful settings for a background and a capable company to tell the story.

Margaret Illington made a charming Yuki, especially in the excellent second act, where she portrayed the changing moods of the half-happy, half-frightened, shy, shrinking bride. She was aro and pretty, and her reading of the lines was music to the ear.

Orrin Johnson, as "Jack," was his usual handsome, good-natured self, and particularly strong when it came to hugging Yuki, for which there was almost as much opportunity as a Coney Island boat on a summer night can offer.

The jolly, fat "foreign devil." He comes smiling forward with the name of the minister in a red vest-pocket notebook, and after him "Bobby," dragging the covering lid, who tells all. Even the consular records are recovered and exhibited, the murder and plot are revealed and Nekko gets it in the flesh syllable of his name.

All this with dreamy, quaint, fanciful settings for a background and a capable company to tell the story.

Margaret Illington made a charming Yuki, especially in the excellent second act, where she portrayed the changing moods of the half-happy, half-frightened, shy, shrinking bride. She was aro and pretty, and her reading of the lines was music to the ear.

Orrin Johnson, as "Jack," was his usual handsome, good-natured self, and particularly strong when it came to hugging Yuki, for which there was almost as much opportunity as a Coney Island boat on a summer night can offer.

The jolly, fat "foreign devil." He comes smiling forward with the name of the minister in a red vest-pocket notebook, and after him "Bobby," dragging the covering lid, who tells all. Even the consular records are recovered and exhibited, the murder and plot are revealed and Nekko gets it in the flesh syllable of his name.

EVERYBODY BUYS ON CREDIT

WHY NOT YOU? OUR FACILITIES FOR SERVING YOU ARE UNSURPASSED. OUR STOCKS LARGE AND UP TO DATE, AND OUR TERMS ARE UNUSUALLY LIBERAL. BY AN OUTLAY OF LESS THAN 15 CENTS PER DAY AND OUR EASY PAYMENT SYSTEM YOU CAN HAVE WHAT YOU NEED IN MEN'S, WOMEN'S & CHILDREN'S CLOTHING.

FURS, MILLINERY, DIAMONDS, WATCHES AND JEWELRY. WEAR IT AND PAY FOR IT ON EASY WEEKLY OR MONTHLY PAYMENTS. PER WEEK $1 PER WEEK. PRICES SAME AS FOR CASH. MANHATTAN CLOTHING CO.

1114 3d Ave., Near 65th St. 2274 4th Ave., Near 124th St. 295 8th Ave., Near 24th St. BROOKLYN, 700 BROADWAY. OPEN EVENINGS.

MRS. FOLSEY GOES FREE.

On Trial for Bigamy, Jury Recommended Verdict for Acquittal.

Helen Carson Folsey was arraigned before Judge Warren B. Foster to-day, charged with bigamy. It was shown that she had married John J. Folsey, of No. 249 Spring street, and William A. Folsey, of Arlington.

The young woman did not deny the marriage, but she produced testimony concerning Folsey's treatment of her that led the jury to make a recommendation for mercy. Judge Foster allowed her to go under suspended sentence.

ACTOR'S MONEY HELD UP.

Adler's Bank Account Attached for Judgment Against Him.

Jacob P. Adler, the Jewish tragedian, whose Shylock won much attention, asked Justice Conlan, of the City Court, to-day, to make the Oriental Bank, in the Bowery, honor the checks the actor draws upon his account there.

When Mr. Adler presented his check at the bank yesterday he was met with the reply: "The bank has no account with you."

"Jack" Bigelow, otherwise Orrin Johnson, of heart courageous, rushes forward and starts a "rough-house." Yuki flees. So does "Jack." He is soliloquizing on the road to Tokyo, when she pops out of the bushes, a beautiful girl, painting out of something which looks like vegetable portraiture. They have never spoken before. But that doesn't matter. "Jack" swears before a dinky god that he loves her and wants her for wife, and they hustle over to the Imperial Hotel and get married by an American minister.

Then Nekko gets busy and shows that George Arliss isn't the only Japanese villain who can give New York shivers. He tires Yuki, a nakado (which is Japanese for schachten), to steal the American Consul's seal, and the book containing the record of the marriage stolen.

Looking for Sister.

With these pleasant preparations made, Taro, the brother of Yuki, who has been "Jack's" college buddy, returns from America looking for sister.

When he finds her with "Jack" and without any proof of their marriage the family circle assumes a warlike aspect. For fear that "Jack" like the American Consul, will be murdered, Yuki, with her Yale picked mind, makes a quiet sneak to the Temple of Shiba, nobly resolved to dance herself to death. "Jack" and his pal, "Bobby" Newcombe, get into the sacred dance hall without a visitor's card and witness her specialty.

But they're not allowed to go behind the scenes, and next you see the dejected husband he's sitting in his lonely cottage wondering whether he will sell the furniture or have it stored.

"The song of the nightingale is heard. 'Am I dreaming?' asks 'Jack.' No, he is not. For the first time in his life, he has seen the moonlight. Yuki, the next minute Yuki isn't in the moonlight. She's in 'Jack's' arms."

"Jack" is protecting her with his strong right, when Nekko, who's brother and a Cherry Hill rethru, comes in to perform the separation act.

But hold, Nekko! You have forgotten

the jolly, fat "foreign devil." He comes smiling forward with the name of the minister in a red vest-pocket notebook, and after him "Bobby," dragging the covering lid, who tells all. Even the consular records are recovered and exhibited, the murder and plot are revealed and Nekko gets it in the flesh syllable of his name.

All this with dreamy, quaint, fanciful settings for a background and a capable company to tell the story.

Margaret Illington made a charming Yuki, especially in the excellent second act, where she portrayed the changing moods of the half-happy, half-frightened, shy, shrinking bride. She was aro and pretty, and her reading of the lines was music to the ear.

Orrin Johnson, as "Jack," was his usual handsome, good-natured self, and particularly strong when it came to hugging Yuki, for which there was almost as much opportunity as a Coney Island boat on a summer night can offer.

The jolly, fat "foreign devil." He comes smiling forward with the name of the minister in a red vest-pocket notebook, and after him "Bobby," dragging the covering lid, who tells all. Even the consular records are recovered and exhibited, the murder and plot are revealed and Nekko gets it in the flesh syllable of his name.

All this with dreamy, quaint, fanciful settings for a background and a capable company to tell the story.

Margaret Illington made a charming Yuki, especially in the excellent second act, where she portrayed the changing moods of the half-happy, half-frightened, shy, shrinking bride. She was aro and pretty, and her reading of the lines was music to the ear.

Orrin Johnson, as "Jack," was his usual handsome, good-natured self, and particularly strong when it came to hugging Yuki, for which there was almost as much opportunity as a Coney Island boat on a summer night can offer.

The jolly, fat "foreign devil." He comes smiling forward with the name of the minister in a red vest-pocket notebook, and after him "Bobby," dragging the covering lid, who tells all. Even the consular records are recovered and exhibited, the murder and plot are revealed and Nekko gets it in the flesh syllable of his name.

All this with dreamy, quaint, fanciful settings for a background and a capable company to tell the story.

Margaret Illington made a charming Yuki, especially in the excellent second act, where she portrayed the changing moods of the half-happy, half-frightened, shy, shrinking bride. She was aro and pretty, and her reading of the lines was music to the ear.

Orrin Johnson, as "Jack," was his usual handsome, good-natured self, and particularly strong when it came to hugging Yuki, for which there was almost as much opportunity as a Coney Island boat on a summer night can offer.

The jolly, fat "foreign devil." He comes smiling forward with the name of the minister in a red vest-pocket notebook, and after him "Bobby," dragging the covering lid, who tells all. Even the consular records are recovered and exhibited, the murder and plot are revealed and Nekko gets it in the flesh syllable of his name.

All this with dreamy, quaint, fanciful settings for a background and a capable company to tell the story.

Margaret Illington made a charming Yuki, especially in the excellent second act, where she portrayed the changing moods of the half-happy, half-frightened, shy, shrinking bride. She was aro and pretty, and her reading of the lines was music to the ear.

Orrin Johnson, as "Jack," was his usual handsome, good-natured self, and particularly strong when it came to hugging Yuki, for which there was almost as much opportunity as a Coney Island boat on a summer night can offer.

The jolly, fat "foreign devil." He comes smiling forward with the name of the minister in a red vest-pocket notebook, and after him "Bobby," dragging the covering lid, who tells all. Even the consular records are recovered and exhibited, the murder and plot are revealed and Nekko gets it in the flesh syllable of his name.

All this with dreamy, quaint, fanciful settings for a background and a capable company to tell the story.

Margaret Illington made a charming Yuki, especially in the excellent second act, where she portrayed the changing moods of the half-happy, half-frightened, shy, shrinking bride. She was aro and pretty, and her reading of the lines was music to the ear.

Orrin Johnson, as "Jack," was his usual handsome, good-natured self, and particularly strong when it came to hugging Yuki, for which there was almost as much opportunity as a Coney Island boat on a summer night can offer.

The jolly, fat "foreign devil." He comes smiling forward with the name of the minister in a red vest-pocket notebook, and after him "Bobby," dragging the covering lid, who tells all. Even the consular records are recovered and exhibited, the murder and plot are revealed and Nekko gets it in the flesh syllable of his name.

EVERYBODY BUYS ON CREDIT

WHY NOT YOU? OUR FACILITIES FOR SERVING YOU ARE UNSURPASSED. OUR STOCKS LARGE AND UP TO DATE, AND OUR TERMS ARE UNUSUALLY LIBERAL. BY AN OUTLAY OF LESS THAN 15 CENTS PER DAY AND OUR EASY PAYMENT SYSTEM YOU CAN HAVE WHAT YOU NEED IN MEN'S, WOMEN'S & CHILDREN'S CLOTHING.

FURS, MILLINERY, DIAMONDS, WATCHES AND JEWELRY. WEAR IT AND PAY FOR IT ON EASY WEEKLY OR MONTHLY PAYMENTS. PER WEEK $1 PER WEEK. PRICES SAME AS FOR CASH. MANHATTAN CLOTHING CO.

1114 3d Ave., Near 65th St. 2274 4th Ave., Near 124th St. 295 8th Ave., Near 24th St. BRO